HISTORICAL NOTES

The Ojibway people living on the North Shore of Lake Superior (the ancestor's of Long Lake #58 First Nation people) subsisted by hunting, fishing and gathering. As the fur trade moved into the superior area, they expanded their economic activities to include hunting and trapping for trade purposes. By the early 19th century, Ojibway hunting ranges had evolved into well defined trapping territories. In about 1800 the North West Company built the Long Lake Fort, on a site that was believed to be an old French post.

The Long Lake reserve is within the boundaries of the territory described by the Robinson Superior Treaty of 1850 and was confirmed by the Order-in-council in 1914. The original reserve area was located east and south of its present location, but an 1887 survey indicated that the land was not suitable for the installation of services, so the reserve was moved to its' present site. In 1907, after the signing of the James Bay Treaty of 1905 – Treaty 9, the names of 65 members of the Long Lake Band were transferred from the Robinson-Superior annuity pay list (Long Lake #58) to the annuity pay list for Treaty 9 (Long Lake No. 77 – Ginoogaming)
